Husky Bus Seeks to Provide a Klondike Experience

Story and Photos By Dan Davidson

When Jesse Cooke talks about the Klondike Experience, he wants it to be quite clear that the award winning Husky Bus operation he started just four years ago isn't going away. You might even say it's going everywhere.

In fact, the business' new brand name is really just an attempt to capture all the things that Husky Bus has taken on since the original smaller vans he began with first started rolling back and forth to Whitehorse in 2012.

"The Klondike Experience is meant to reflect all that we do," he said. "Husky Bus is going to stay alive, as the transportation link. When you think 'bus company' you don't think of all the other things. You think 'transport'. We're just trying to market ourselves online and worldwide a little bit more, to reflect what we've actually been doing."

What have they been doing? Well, the bus side of things alone has taken on the task of running a shuttle service to and from the airport during its operating season, which is early May to the end of September, the same as the Klondike Highway season. It is also available for charters (including trips to Alaska), or last May's Dawson Study Tour, during the Yukon and the First World War Conference, as well as tours around Dawson, the Goldfields, the Midnight Dome and out to Tombstone Park.

Husky has made Solstice night celebrations on the Dome much safer by offering a shuttle service, and has facilitated the monthly Saturday night coffee houses at the Tombstone interpretive centre.

Then there are the bicycle rentals, which have resulted in quite a few more visitors peddling around town in the summer.

The Tombstone excursions go beyond just bus rides, with three different options of adventure tours this summer.

The biggest change is in the addition of winter, packages, which include opportunities for viewing the Northern Lights, and are combined with accommodations and meals at the Aurora Inn. There may also be dog mushing opportunities.

The Klondike Experience is actually trying to add to that elusive winter visitor season that never quite seems to get beyond the Yukon Quest Week and the one-weekend Trek Over the Top.

Cooke likes to partner with existing operations, or encourage other people to think up ways that synergies can be developed. Possible partners have included the Aurora Inn, local mushers, the Dawson City Museum, Parks Canada and Air North. He's happy to provide customers for other people to share.

"I think the way to do it is to partner with people who are already doing things," he says, "and not have the big outdoor adventure company that has to own all this gear and stuff."

"I think it's good for everybody. I just see us all benefitting from it."

News and Happenings from the Dawson City
Community Library

The Library is excited to be hosting two author presentations in September. Both presentations are free and open to everyone, plus light refreshments will be served.

On Monday 19 September at 7 p.m. current Berton House Writer-in-Residence and noted poet, Claire Caldwell, will give a reading. Claire has been here since July, and has been working on her second full-length poetry manuscript (when not taking in the wilderness or helping to foster the local literary scene). Her new book will pick up on themes of the natural world that she explored in her debut collection, Invasive Species. The following week, on Tuesday 27 September at 7 p.m. author and performer Bob Bossin will read from his prizewinning book Davy the Punk, depicting his father's life in Toronto's gambling underworld of the 1930s and 40s.

It's that time of year when we reap the harvest and prepare for the winter months. To help Dawsonites with their preparations, the Library has prepared a special display of useful how-to books. Subjects include juicing, foraging, berry picking, cellaring, home sausage and cheese making, preserving, and much more. Whether you're gathering produce from your garden, venturing out to pick berries, or planning to hunt some wild game, we're sure to have a book that will help you stock your larder.

Tatsuya Nakatani: Cymbals and Gongs Transformed

Story by Meg Walker

When sound artist Tatsuya Nakatani introduced his show last Friday night in the KIAC Ballroom, he presented the idea that listening happens with all the senses and the whole body.

Clad in loose black clothes with a waist-length ponytail swaying down his back, Nakatani joked that while seeing "an Asian guy with gongs" might look like traditional music would ensue, he was going to create sound art for us. Listening happens with your skin, with your hair, he explained, gesturing gracefully.

The Japanese-American artist's motion indicated his instrument arrangement: three large gongs and three small drums, an array of loose cymbals and singing bowls, and two massive soft mallets.

Chairs formed a relaxed half-circle around the "stage," running the length of the room. "Tatsuya walked around the room snapping his fingers to find the best spot for sound," said Matt Sarty, KIAC's Events Coordinator. The setup allowed maximum acoustic exposure for the listeners.

Sound saturation began with the first note: a gentle mallet strike on the largest gong. At 46" wide it offered a low, warm note. Then the next gong: 42" and a little brighter. Then Nakatani took up one of his hand-made bows. He began drawing it across the two gongs, one at a time, in slow, continuous motions that created layers of vibration.

Soon the room itself was vibrating. Within these waves, Nakatani pushed and pulled cymbals across drums, bows across singing bowls, breath through cracked cymbal against drumskin. It wasn't melodious, nor was meant to be; the sustained notes acted as a cushion for the complex experimental sounds to spark, jump, scrape. Frenetic, then dancing.

Listeners later said it was like listening to an ocean storm. Some sounds were abrasive, but it was clear the whole time that Nakatani would create a shape that would carry the sound back to calm. In fact, several people reported they were lulled almost to sleep.

The show had an unfiltered human response at the end. Nakatani tapped the gongs, slowing to a close, the near-silence tangible with reverberations. A toddler, breastfeeding, softly started to hiccup. Curiously, the gentle tones complemented each other.

A free-jazz and improv background clearly shapes Nakatani's sound art. The music isn't scored. "I know I start with the gong, and I end with the gong, but the rest is improvised."

Much of his style comes from playing with experimental musicians in New York City in the late 1990s, he said at his artist's talk the next day. Born and raised in Kobe, Japan, Nakatani moved to the United States at short notice when a friend told him about a vacant apartment. As he got to know musicians, he ended up in New York, playing everywhere (a partial list of collaborators is on his website, www.hhproduction.org).

"For a few years I played ten hours a day," he says. "Seven hours a day with bands in the subway, then three hours at a show at night."

Nakatani described a pivotal moment to becoming a solo performer. Listening to recordings of himself as percussionist in various bands, he realized he played the same intro and outro rhythm every time on the high hat and on the ride cymbal.

"And I mean exactly the same! So I threw them away from my set. Suddenly, I was free."

On the road for more than 200 days in an average year, Nakatani has been on the road since June in his Mercedes-Benz Sprinter (converted into an RV with multiple slots for the instruments). As you read this he's playing in Alaska. Turns out the freedom hinges on immense commitment and work, as the artist is also his own booking manager.

Dawson City appeared on Nakatani's radar after a former KIAC artist-in-resident, Donna Akrey, arranged a gig for him in Hamilton, Ontario. She was impressed by the experience: "It will rearrange your cells!"

She thought Dawson might appreciate Nakatani work. A chain of ensuing emails connected him with Sarty, who took the risk and booked sound art for KIAC.

Mid-day Friday, before sound check, Nakatani and I chatted in the sunshine on the ODD Gallery stairs.

In all that driving, Nakatani says, he keeps pulling in to the same gas stations, same corner stores, whenever he's on a familiar road. "I have no choice, it just happens!"

Comparing himself to a migrating bird, he talked about the human need to keep moving as a way to keep ideas growing, as a way to access spirituality. Whatever it is that sustains this international recording and performing artist, I hope Nakatani's migration pattern now includes Dawson City, so we can enter his expansive, ear-opening music more than once.

Uffish Thoughts: This demolition is a wasted opportunity

By Dan Davidson

At the risk of repeating myself, let me say once again that the recently announced release of a tender to demolish the former McDonald Lodge in Dawson City is an example of short-sighted thinking and certainly a wasted opportunity.

The number of repurposed buildings in Dawson City is quite large. My own home, transported here from Clinton Creek after that mine closed, is but a minor example, one of half a dozen (at least) buildings transported here rather than being demolished. Others were brought to town from the Yukon Consolidated Gold Corp. compound in Bear Creek rather than be left to decay.

Our former fire hall moved to become what passes for a drug store in town. The current firehall/city hall was relocated clear across town when it turned out that its original location on Fifth Avenue was no longer tenable.

The Robert Service Wing on the Westmark Hotel is the major portion of the original Robert Service School. It was trundled down Fifth Avenue, turned edgewise, and refurbished as the hotel annex that has what must be the widest hotel hallways in the territory.

At the north end of the lane behind my home, a formerly abandoned two-storey house is being restored to use, having been relocated there from Eighth Avenue last year.

The point of all this – and I haven’t given you the two best examples yet – is that there’s no need to waste an existing building here once it has outlived its original use.

The best use for the old McDonald Lodge would have been to convert it to a residence building that could have housed the students from the Yukon School of Visual Arts during their academic year, and perhaps have been available for shorter term summer rentals.

Those who tried to sell this idea to the territorial government met with a mental stone wall and the same attitude that demolished both the government owned Korbo Apartment building and the superannuated Dawson Community Health Centre (where the new McDonald Lodge now sits) and trucked their bits and pieces out to the Quigley Landfill, shortening its lifespan by a considerable amount.

The tender announcement, as reported in the Yukon News, indicated that costs were a major factor. $2 million dollars would have been needed to bring the building up to code and another $6 million to “upgrade it to modern care standards.”

This appears to be a reference to a suggestion that someone might have thought keeping the building as an extended care annex might have been a good idea. Despite that statement by spokesperson Erin Loxam, this is a not an idea that was floated at any of the public meetings regarding the new building that I attended and reported on. Local arguments for more capacity told the government to put a second floor on the planned building, or to construct it in such a way that a second floor could be added later.

Neither of those things happened of course, nor did they accept the argument that a roof structure without a sufficient slope is a recipe for problems somewhere down the line.

It is telling that Loxam went on to say “Renovating the building to be something other than a continuing care facility was not specifically looked at but would certainly cost more than building a new building on that site.”

They were asked to look at alternative uses, and there has never been any suggestion that simply fixing the old seniors’ lodge as a continuing care facility would be acceptable.

Apparently we are supposed to believe the argument given to our mayor and council that, as Mayor Potoroka is quoted saying, “...a number of people get that it might have just been too difficult to renovate.”

I mentioned earlier that there were two great examples of building restoration I hadn’t given you yet. Here they are.

The first is the Oddfellows Hall, which sat derelict for years until it was transformed into the KIAC (Klondike Institute of Art and Culture) Building, a bustling and vital part of Dawson’s artistic development and a jewel at the corner of Second Avenue and Princess Street.

The second example is the condemned former territorial government liquor store and office building at the corner of Queen Street and Third Avenue. It was magically converted into the Yukon School of Visual Arts, the same institution that is now stalled in its development and growth from a one year program to a two year diploma granting college largely because there is no housing available for its students.

But that story doesn’t end there, because the YSOVA building became the anchor to attach the new Yukon College Campus building to, ending decades of this important institution floating from site to site (including the second floor of the building that is now YSOVA) around the town.

Now, it is important for you to know that the contractor whose planning restored both of those damaged buildings to vibrant and useful health is Greg Hakonson, the same person who has steadily maintained that the old McDonald Lodge was fixable and usable. It would not be without cost, but since the government has consistently shown no signs of coming up with any other solution to the student residency problem, it is a proposal that ought to have been taken seriously.

The old McDonald Lodge, seen here in the winter of 2013, will soon be demolished instead of being recycled.

We want to hear from you!

LETTER Farewell to Breaker

Letter from Paul Marcotte

Breaker died last week. Breaker was one of my bonehead buddies in the Yukon. I don't like this news. This news makes me sad. But I accept this news.

A couple of days ago, my friends in the Yukon sent me a short email to inform me about Breaker. I'm quite sure that they are much sadder than I am. Breaker was a wonderful companion, and like most Border collies he was as smart as a whip. Breaker shared his home in Bear Creek with two of his siblings, Skidder and Roxy, a furball named Trouble, and his two, two legged companions, Janice and Terry. On occasion, another sibling, named Deuce would come for a visit for a day or two, and when I was up there this past January to house-sit, his mother Becca had moved in full time. My friends also mentioned in their email that Becca died back in March, so now there is just Skidder and Roxy remaining, and of course Trouble the furball.

I love all of these boneheads, but for whatever reason, right from the get go, Breaker made the decision to be my best buddy. Prior to Becca moving in, when there were just the three amigos, it was always Breaker who would try to get as close to me as possible, and if either Roxy or Skidder tried to change that arrangement, Breaker would somehow figure out how to worm his way through the other two, so that he could be right next to me.

As I mentioned a moment ago, he was smart. When I had the opportunity to house-sit back in 2010, I can remember Breaker the "jail breaker" as I came to think of him for a while. My friends had a large part of their property adjacent to the road, fenced off. It was a great place to put the three amigos, so that they could be outside but still on the property. But the system never worked quite as well as it should have, because somehow, Breaker would find a way to get out. This escape technique seemed to be above the pay grade of Skidder and Roxy, but not Breaker. After two or three jail breaks, I conceded that Breaker was smarter than I was, and I gave up on the idea of trying to keep him in that enclosure. He was trying to tell me something, that being, "I'm smarter than you, and I'd rather be with you than separated from you, even though you're not as smart as I am." Maybe he was thinking that if he could just spend enough time with the stupid human, that some of his intelligence would finally rub off on me. I'm not sure if he was successful.

The three amigos and I would spend many hours walking around on the frozen tailings ponds that are situated immediately behind the property. Occasionally I would find an old stick to use as a walking aid. With the four of us roaming around out there, we would attract the attention of Laski, the neighbour's German Shepard. Laski was focused on grabbing my walking stick, and when that happened, Breaker would be the one to butt in immediately. Whether he was trying to protect me, or if he just didn't like Laski, I'm not sure. But it wouldn't be too long before, Laski would turn tail and head back home, and the four of us were left to continue our wanderings around in the snow.

I've lost track of the number of nights that the boneheads and I would climb up to one of our favourite viewing spots amongst the tailings piles, sit down in the snow, and just be. Up above, a star studded sky, the best I've ever seen, and on some evenings, the Aurora Borealis would be on display, with colours and sounds that were literally out of this world. We were content to sit there, and hang out for maybe an hour or so before heading back home. Of the three boneheads, Breaker would be the one sitting closest to me. Always.

One more memory from 2010. Terry had provided me with his work van to drive to town and back, and I would usually load up Breaker, Skidder and Roxy so that they could come along for the ride. I would open the door to the rear section of the van for them, and no matter which one initially got to the passenger seat first, it would eventually be Breaker that somehow managed to commandeer the seat. And, if at some point in the journey either of the other two tried to even get close to the passenger seat, Breaker would growl and sneer at them, just to let them know that he would be sitting there for the entirety of the trip, thank you very much. Of the three, Skidder is the largest, but even he would be intimidated by Breaker's performance, and before long, both he and Roxy would settle back down in the back of the van, resigned to the fact that for this journey at least, Breaker would keep the front seat. This would happen on every trip, and I would get a chuckle out of it each and every time.

And finally, one more Breaker story to round things out, a story that I am not sure that my friends would like to know about, but here it is. Normally, the boneheads sleep in the kitchen. The master bedroom is next to the kitchen. I tended to leave the door slightly ajar. All the boneheads would be settled down for the night on their respective cushions, and I would head to bed. By morning, every single one of them would be in the bedroom with me, and it would be Breaker on the bed, with the other three (this included Becca at the time) curled up in various locations on the floor. While I was asleep, there was a kitchen conspiracy that resulted in a mass migration to the bedroom. I made sure to do a complete vacuum prior to my friends returning home, in order to destroy any of the hairy Border collie evidence.

I have recently re-read a book that I first came across in 1981. The title is, "On Death and Dying" by Elizabeth Kübler-Ross. The main premise of the book is that when a loss is suffered, a person has to go through five stages of grief, those being, denial, anger, bargaining, depression, and finally acceptance. Try as we may, to short circuit these stages of grief, it remains key to helping the individual at some future point, move on with their lives. The wisdom contained in this book has been very beneficial over the years. Grief from loss is a very personal thing, and it's different for everyone. I can only imagine what my friends are going through, as a result of losing Breaker and Becca, but maybe in time, after they have worked through the depression phase, the acceptance phase will arrive, and thoughts of Breaker, that at the moment may bring a tear, will turn to thoughts of Breaker that bring a smile and a laugh. I sure hope so.

Paul, formerly employed at the Dawson City General Store, and for a time as the local dog catcher (where he fell in love with Snowball the dog and from that point on became a dog lover), now wanders the world doing pet/house sitting. He writes a blog four times a month called "The Thoughtful Wanderer" which can be found at wherespaulnow.blogspot.com

He's lived all over the world but considers Dawson the closest he's ever come to calling a place home.

Story by Angharad Wenz

By the summer of 1898, Dawson was an over-saturated market. Rival businesses, offering similar services and supplies, vied for the same Klondike customers. One of the best ways to draw commerce away from competitors – as it remains today – was through eye-catching advertising. Signs trimmed the fronts and roofs of tents, cabins and multi-storey buildings. Canvas banners were stretched across streets and draped between buildings. Placards could be found on every corner, and even on the backs of donkeys roaming the streets. Bold, hand-painted fonts embossed the entire streetscape of Dawson, becoming an integral part of the boomtown's aesthetic. Unsurprisingly, a number of commercial artists prospered in the growing industry of sign-painting, including one Frederick Atwood.

A talented artist who had studied fresco and decorative arts, Frederick Nelson Atwood began his career refurbishing homes on the west coast. One of his first jobs was decorating the mansion of Ezra Meeker – the "Hop-King of the World", in 1890. Coincidentally, both Atwood and Meeker would follow the stampede northward – the former arriving in the Klondike by 1898. Both had little success mining and would move on to other ventures, selling their artistic skill and evaporated vegetables respectively.

Atwood established a partnership with photographer, George Cantwell, setting up shop on Second Avenue. Although predominantly sign painters, the duo's services also included designing and painting theatre sets, hanging wallpaper and other interior decorating work, photography and taxidermy. The wallpaper business, in particular, proved lucrative in a town where lumber was in short supply. A popular covering for cabin walls and ceilings, wallpaper on canvas was also a common substitute for interior partitions. These "telephone walls" not only saved money, but were also a great source of local gossip!

Whether the business partners continued to share a storefront is uncertain, for as early as 1901 both had begun advertising separately in local papers and programs as Cantwell, "the photographer", and Atwood, "the decorator". Perhaps as Dawson's newspaper industry grew, the medium for marketing business shifted. Sign painting may indeed have lost its primacy to the printed ad – a likely cheaper alternative for Klondike entrepreneurs. This shift is echoed in Atwood's own promotion (see below), which highlights his ability to make "the home beautiful". Although signs remained a noted speciality, it seems that Atwood's enterprise had adapted to the increasing "sophistication" of a settled Dawson.

Despite this change, it seems that Atwood's popularity in the theatrical arts continued unabated. Although certainly the number of theatres within Dawson declined after the turn of the century, the town's enthusiasm for staged entertainment remained. The Auditorium, Orpheum and Opera House held multiple performances in which Atwood often assisted – as set decorator, artistic director and, occasionally, as performer. His passion for theatre is evident in his personal collection of programs, playbills and posters gifted to the Museum by his great granddaughter. As "Arctic Chief" of the Arctic Brotherhood, he undoubtedly helped to organize and participated in many events held at the AB Hall – today Diamond Tooth Gertie's. Atwood also volunteered for a range of other community events, including costuming the attendees of local balls and coordinating the entertainment committee for the Yukon Horticultural and Industrial Exhibition.

Atwood's artistry was clearly appreciated locally, and he found camaraderie amongst the Klondike's creative circle. Robert Service was a close friend, and had Atwood illustrate some of his published work. From an inscription written by Service to Atwood in a copy of Ballads of a Cheechako, we also know that both were members of the mysterious "Nighthawk Club" during their time here.

Frederick Atwood would remain in Dawson until 1912, when he relocated with his family to Seattle. There he continued a career in entertainment, working for the Hippodrome Amusement Company. He did not forget his Klondike experience and became a prominent member of the Sourdough Stampede Association – a group of former Alaskan and Yukon sourdoughs. As editor of the association's Alaska Yukon Gold Book, Atwood contributed a couple of his own poems and compiled a number of local histories. He remained an ardent promoter of the Klondike and its golden past, perpetuating an image and ideal that continues to inspire popular consciousness today. On the streets of Dawson and in the minds of thousands, Atwood helped to craft both literally and figuratively a distinct Klondike aesthetic.

Clockwise from top left: (1) An ad for Atwood's home decorating business, "Signs a Specialty." (2) Frederick M. Atwood as Admiral Porter - in HMS Pinafore by the Dawson Yukon Operatic Society. (3) A hand-painted Yukon Transfer Corp banner from the Dawson City Museum's collection (too long to unroll in storage!) was typical of the banners stretching across Dawson's congested streets.

Month of September News

Hi Klondike,

I've said it, you've heard it...the sky's the limit...I have experienced another sphere. An emotivesphere - the point where the outermost layer of the earth's atmosphere and the innermost emotion of gratitude meet. Yes, it was out of this world!

Volunteering with Special Olympics Yukon in July opened my eyes and widened my vision. I saw determination. I witnessed fear. I shouted support at the top of my lungs and I whispered, "you are amazing" to every athlete. We high fived and hugged!

"Let me win, but if I cannot win, let me be brave in the attempt." Special Olympic oath

This oath is my oath.

I took this promise with me to the 2016 Canada 55+ Games in Ontario where I participated as a member of the Yukon Lawn Bowling Team, pictured here practicing with teammate Bonnie.

I will also take my determination, my fear and my courage. (Mine is a big suitcase.) We took home silver in our category-- woo hoo!

Special Olympics is dedicated to changing lives through sport. I know they changed mine.

"Let me play. I believe in me." ~Mo Oath

Mo's Message

Limitless Skies

The Wright brothers shared a dream - to build a flying machine. The world watched and reported and celebrated their victories...even when skeptics doubted it could be done.

Orville and Wilbur Wright recorded over 1,000 glider flights and 7 years of testing before their 12-second flight of glory made headlines.

Had the Wright brothers listened to the naysayers, some reporting, "1 to 10 million years before a working airplane could be built", their dreams may have crashed.

But the Wright brothers didn't give up. They showed conviction. They took chances and they had nerve.

What do the Wright brothers, Special Olympics and Team Yukon have in common?

We measure the sky and our dreams as limitless.

Yukon News Friday August 12, 2016
Used with the author's permission

Dawson City's museum received a slice of community life Aug. 7, when it accepted a donation of nearly 100,000 photographs from the Klondike Sun newspaper.

The photographs represent everything that was chronicled by the community newspaper from its founding in 1889, until it converted to digital photography around 2000.

"I went digital in 1999," said Dan Davidson, the paper's editor and co-founder. "It didn't take long to realize that we could save six to seven hours on a production weekend by going digital."

Digitization marked the end of the era of mixing chemicals and working in the darkroom for hours producing the half-tone prints required for the monthly, then later, bi-weekly editions of the Sun.

Alex Somerville, director of the Dawson Museum said the collection represents history that is not yet viewed as history, but will come to be seen as a graphic record of community life in 40 or 50 years.

Kathy Jones-Gates, who co-founded and edited the newspaper with Davidson in the early days, said the photographs capture practically every event in Dawson City for more than a decade. She said it was crucial for this record to remain in Dawson City, where it was most relevant.

Commissioner's balls, spring break-up, music festivals, even births and children's birthdays were among the events captured by the team of volunteers who worked to document everyday life in the community for 10 years.

Dawson City has never been without a newspaper. During the early years when the gold rush town had a large population, as many as three newspapers (the Dawson Daily News, the Yukon World and the Yukon Sun) were publishing simultaneously. That was reduced to one after 1909.

The Dawson News finally closed its doors in 1954, after Yukon's capital moved to Whitehorse, but an active group of women called "The Nutty Club," continued to produce a bi-weekly mimeographed newsletter called the Klondike Korner, until Davidson, Jones-Gates and others realized that it was possible to produce a regular newspaper again. In 1989 the Klondike Sun was born and continues to document events in Dawson City nearly 30 years later.

2016 was a bountiful year for local gardeners

Story and Photos
By Tarie Castellarin

We guess the warm, rainy season was nicer to plants than people! There were over 55 participants exhibiting a variety of produce. Thank you to all our enthusiastic participants, helpful volunteers, and the many organizations that contribute their support make the success of this event possible:

- » Lodge #1 YOOP for their sponsorship (banners, ribbons, advertising)
- » KIAC for the loan of the tent
- » The Dawson City Museum for the historical gardening photo displays and pictures
- » Volunteers for set up and take down of tents & tables
- » The judges...Lenore Calnan, Sharon Edmunds,
- » Myrna Butterworth, Muffy MacDonald,
- » Palma Berger, Minnie Beets, Vicki Roberts, Shirley Hill, Dave Dunning (San Antonio, Texas), Rian Lougheed-Smith, Diana McReady, Gigi Bigras
- » The enthusiasm & support from the gang at the VIC
- » KPMA for their tablecloths
- » KVA for publishing the program and advertising the event

Thank you to the market gardeners; Karen Digby & Grant Dowdell, Jack & Lucy Vogt, and Otto & Connie Muhlbach for donating the high quality produce for the silent auction. Schmidt Mining was the highest bidder. Money raised from the silent auction was donated to the Dawson Food Bank, along with a donation from the Gammie family. It was great to have the Tr'ondëk Hwëch'in Farm School students participate in this year's event.

The Grand Aggregate Winners was calculated by a count of successful entries and first place ribbons in a combination of categories. The 2016 Grand Aggregate winners are Louise Piche (First Place), Marg VanDusen (Second Place) and The Penrose Family (Third Place)...congratulations and thanks for your enthusiasm!

It was a banner year for children's entries. A shout out to the school's spring seed planting activity, because many of the children took their plants home and nurtured them over the summer!

The "Sandi Coleman Strange but True" category was created following a friendly CBC Radio interview. The entries in this category proved to be a delight to all our visitors.

The Horticultural Exhibition has been a staple of the Klondike Valley since 1903 and possibly earlier. We have a historical article from 1904 describing the four-day event. Some interesting categories included: painting on china, furs & pelts, oil paintings, wood carvings, wildflowers, baking, and grains & grasses. We are proud to continue this fine tradition and maintain a historical connection to our colorful past. Everyone is inspired and encouraged by what they see at the exhibition and we look forward to what 2017 will bring.

Thank you!

Buried

By Erika Rauguth

Prose Winner: Authors on Eighth

"The wall's come down on them...Shovels! We need shovels!" The corporal scrambled towards the white and panicked faces of the soldiers that were approaching.

"You can't even tell there was a trench there, Sir. Surely none have survived!"

"Just dig! For God's sake, dig! Lieutenant Black's in there, along with five of his men!"

"But surely they are gone, sir. The blast was right beside them. Besides, we're in the sights of the enemy, Sir. We're going to get shot!"

"There is no time for debate. These are my men, from my company, the Yukon Motor MG. None of us came from the Klondike to be buried alive in the mud of France. Now, shut up and start digging or by God, I will shoot you myself!"

There was no noise. I only remember the silence, but before my eyes, I could see their faces, their wide, terror-filled eyes, their open mouths that uttered no sound, their ghost-pale faces and then nothing. Blackness.

Where was I? For a moment, I thought I was back on Bonanza Creek and it must be winter when we'd rise in the dark and carry on for our whole day without a scrap of light. But then I remembered...the war, the mud, the machine guns, the shells...

Where had I been? My aching brain began to recall the scene. Lieutenant Black to the left of me and to the right, Walt.

There was a ringing in my ears but the sound of my own name seemed to be rising above it.

"Harry? Harry, are you alright? Are you alive?"

"Walt?" My voice was thin and it seemed to just drift out of my mouth.

I could now feel the mud on my face and tried to move to wipe it off, only to find my arms pinned beside me, almost behind my back. It was then that I became aware of the heavy weight that seemed to lie like a blanket over my whole body.

"I can't move, Walt!" I heard the panic in my voice. "My arms...they're pinned and my legs...I can't feel them."

A tired reply. "It's the same with me, Harry."

"Oh, God! We're buried. Oh, God!" I did not recognize my own voice as it began to reach a fever pitch.

"Harry. You're wasting air!" he hissed. "Calm down! They will be digging us out in no time, but we need to stay alive for these few minutes."

I could hardly breathe, but I whispered back to him. "Yes, okay."

"Do you have air around your face, I mean, like a pocket of air? What is it like for you?" he asked.

I felt through the darkness, trying to sense what was about me, but the only sensation I could find was mud and more mud. Close to my nose and mouth, there was more of a feeling of loose dirt, which explained why I was not suffocating. "Not much air." I hissed back, so silent I could almost not hear it myself.

I did not imagine that Walt could have heard me, however, he must have because he replied. "Ok well, you listen up. I have a big pocket here, so I'll do all the talking. You just need to stay awake and stay alive. What a change for us, hey Harry. Me talking and you listening."

"Do you remember how it felt when we headed to the Klondike? We were so excited. Such stupid fools, but we didn't care, did we, if it was hard. It was our chance. Do remember the Chilkoot? Do you remember when you didn't think we would make it? We did, though. All the way to Dawson, our backs nearly breaking from our packs, almost losing everything, all our worldly possessions, in the water. Barely 18, and every penny sunk into our big adventure."

"We could have left, hey Harry, but we didn't...no, we stayed. Stayed on through the cold and the work and muck, the hunger. We didn't hit the motherlode, but we didn't die either. It was home, Dawson...it is home still. And then you found Charlotte...and Bessie was born...Remember how you had to talk Father Brown into letting me be godfather even though I wasn't Catholic? 'He'll be in mass every week, I promise' you told him... Ha, you liar! But he knew and he did it anyway. I don't know if you knew this, but I used to bring him moose meat, or a fish or two, whenever I was in town. He was a good old guy."

As Walt talked, I tried to draw up pictures of my home on Ninth Avenue, and my wife, the way she looked when the sun caught her red hair in the evening, replaying my daughter's first steps like a movie reel. I could feel myself calming as my mind returned to my home.

"Remember when we heard about that Joe Boyle was putting together a battalion? Past 30, each of us, yet we were like crazy young school boys again, thinking that we were going to come over here and win this, like we had been in '98, that first day the steamer left Seattle. You'd think we'd have learned something about things like that, about the difference between hope and reality, how life, well, it isn't what you think its going to be. We thought we were going to march into victory, win the war for them, with our machine guns and our Yukon spirit!"

He chuckled slightly at the memory, and I found a smile coming to my lips. My mind returned to that first day when Walt surrendered his comfortable plaid flannel shirt and sacrificed his bushy beard for the cause, and I saw him a few hours later, shaved and trimmed smartly dressed in khaki. I almost would not have recognized him if I hadn't known him from his youth. Still, there were many who had to look twice at the new soldier who walked toward the waterfront that day, seeing the name on his chest as Elliston, which provided no hints as to his identity in a place where he had been simply "Walt" for the 18 years he lived there.

That last day in Dawson, those last moments, flashed before my eyes. As we boarded the ship, I had searched the crowd for Charlotte and saw both pride and sorrow in her face, holding Bess and pointing me out to her. The band music, the speeches, the flag waving, the handkerchiefs that were busily wiping eyes, the cheers...it was all melting together in a fuzzy haze in my mind.

Walt's words echoed my thoughts. "The last time I saw Dawson, standing on the Lightning's deck that day, the whole town was there and we watched them, waving until they were just a blur in the distance. I'm not sure you noticed, but I went and stood right near the front of the ship, with my face into the wind so that nobody would see that I was crying."

"It wasn't what we expected, was it Harry-boy? I had wanted to visit England. My mother was from the north, near Manchester, but I had never been there till we landed. I was sort of excited about it when we left Canada, but I wasn't figuring then that we'd be there so long. Now, of course, I wish we were back there, sitting around, trying to figure when they'd give us actual machine guns to practice with, and of course, those afternoon strolls with Mary."

I tried to make my brain focus on the image of the rosy-cheeked, blond English girl that Walt had taken up an acquaintance with while we were training in Bramshott. She was a pleasant girl and Walt had seemed, well, taken with her. I had been bothered by fleeting fears that he might not want to return to the North when it was all over, that I might lose my friend to the war after all, although not in the way most expected.

"I've got a bit of a secret, Harry...I think...well, I've written a letter and I've asked her, Mary that is...if I make it back...if she'll marry me. I have it right here in my pocket and when we get out of here, I'm going to post it."

I wanted to utter something, give some response to his momentous announcement, but my tongue seemed to be swollen in my mouth and Walt's voice was becoming quiet and distant. He must have sensed something because the next thing he said was "Harry? Harry, say something."

"It's so dark, Walt." I struggled. "I can't see anything. Walt, I think I might be..." The mud and dirt on my face began to feel like a death mask. The panic rose in me again, and I began to feel like I was choking. "It's so dark."

"Dark, Harry? Hold on, we've gotten through this once already." It felt like his whispered voice was just inches from my ear. "Do you remember that winter, the first winter we were out on the creek? I know you do. God, I was not prepared for the darkness. I don't know what the hell I thought it was going to be like on the gold fields in winter, but I wasn't ready for the dark. It seemed to eat the light that our lantern gave off, that dark did. Like it was alive and was snatching the light before it reached our eyes."

"But then, there were those nights, those nights when the sky would light up, like heaven itself was on fire. My god, I don't know if I have ever seen anything so glorious since. The snap and the roar and the crimson flames that seemed to dance above that little cabin, as if it was just for us. Do you remember how I would just stand outside, even in the bitterest cold, and gaze at them? Those lights kept me sane that winter. Do you remember?

"And do you remember the cold? My god, I shudder when I think of it now, even as cold and miserable as we've been in these trenches, I don't know if they compare to that first winter. I would wake up with my beard frozen, I swear it was! And it seemed like that cabin had more holes than a mortal man could chink."

He paused. "Harry do you hear me? Make a sound."

I uttered a small grunt, and that seemed to satisfy him. I could feel my mind becoming foggy, and his voice just seemed to drift away slightly, like he was moving away from me.

"Harry, do you remember how I almost lost my toes that day in February, when I lost my way going to check the fur traps. We were down to almost nothing edible, besides the dried beans and some salt."

"Do you remember how you had to search for me, in the dark and snow? I must have been a sorry mess...I haven't told you this, but I thought I was going to die that day. Right up until the minute I heard your voice, I thought it was the end for me. And then I heard you calling for me. I heard it above the roar of the wind and the dullness of my own mind. And I knew I'd be okay because you came for me. I knew I would live. Harry, that day, life sort of started over for me, like every day after was a gift. I've always felt like I got a second chance and all the days after were borrowed time. That's why I was okay to keep on when it was hard, through the muck and the work and the winters. Why I wasn't worried about going off to war, even at 35. I'd already cheated death"

Walt's voice came as though through a fog now, and I could feel myself starting to slip away as if being pulled into the darkness.

"Harry? Make a sound, Harry." Walt's voice began to drift even farther and was becoming softer. I could hear an urgency in him. "Harry, do you hear me? You need to hang on. I can hear them coming, with the shovels. You need to make noise, to let them know you are alive and where you are."

My tongue felt like it was made of stone and my lips could barely wrap themselves around the words I tried to make. "Walt, I can't. It's too hard."

"No, it's not too hard, Harry! You know what is hard? Surviving in the Klondike! Living as a prospector in a land where the winters are bitter cold and the summers are all mud and mosquitos.

"But we did it, Harry, we did it for almost 20 years and it was a damn good life. And we are going back to it, do you hear me. Private Conners, raise your voice! Shout, otherwise, neither of us is getting home!"

With that, we both seemed to find our voices. I willed every bone and fiber of my being to grunt and call. Our shouts of help were greeted with shovel scrapes and the urgent voices of our rescuers, below the sounds of the continued gunfire and explosions.

I caught a glimpse of the sun, I swear, before exhaustion overcame me and the world turned black.

"Is he dead?"

"No sir, just unconscious. He's all but run out of air. It's amazing that he even made it. But sir, Lieutenant Black is awake and asking about Conners and Ellingston and the other men. Shall I tell him that Conners is alive?"

"Yes, of course, but what about Ellingston. Did we find him?"

"Sir, that isn't going to happen."

"What do you mean?"

"The shell hit Ellingston directly. We have recovered...well, what remains, but sir...we...we only identified him because of his tags."

"Oh my God...Did...did...was he in pain? At the end?"

"Sir, he suffered a direct hit. He would have died instantly, poor fellow."

"Poor fellow? Poor fellow indeed... He might be the luckiest of us all."

Note: ...during an operation near Passchendaele on November 10th, a shell hit and buried Lieutenant Black and five other men. It took some time to dig them out. At one point while buried, Black could hear the diggers discussing whether it was worth excavating for any more survivors (or bodies). SAFETY CORNER

Victoria GOLD CORP

"Back to school...you mean there's more?"

It takes a village....

As students are heading back to school, remember:

On all roads throughout the territory, be it a city street, highway or rural road, motorists travelling in any direction must stop when approaching a stopped school bus with its upper red lights flashing. The upper red lights will stop flashing when all passengers have boarded or departed the bus and it is safe to proceed. Do not start moving your vehicle until the red lights have stopped flashing and the bus begins to move.

Reduce your speed and pay careful attention when driving in school and playground zones as children may be arriving or leaving at any time, or on their lunch hour. Smaller children are harder to see than adults and are less predictable.

We at Victoria Gold encourage you to 'think safety' as we are all responsible for ensuring that students arrive to school and home again safely.

Victoria Gold Corp. plans to construct, operate, and close the Eagle Gold Project located northeast of Mayo, in the Dublin Gulch claims region. The Company understands that health and safety is an essential part of our success and is committed to protecting the health and safety of all our workers.

Tragedy Strikes Tr'ondek Hwech'in

BY DAN DAVIDSON
Sun Staff

While the scent of wood smoke in the air can be soothing on an evening in late August, there was nothing comfortable about that smell on August 30, for it signalled the passing of a local first nation landmark, the Chief Isaac Memorial Centre.

The Front Street Dawson building has been a striking presence on the corner of Front and Duke streets for a number of years, and has grown in that time. The first addition to the Tr'ondek Hwech'in's holdings there was the Tr'ondek Heritage Centre, and then, later, the two structures were joined by a bridging building that came to include the increasing need of the first nation for office space and to provide much needed office rental space in the community.

The original building and the most recent addition are gone now, shattered timbers and trusses mark the south end of Chief Isaac, while the interior structure is a gaping cavity ending at the fire wall of the Tr'ondek Centre, a fire wall which, mercifully, held back the conflagration which swept through the linked attic spaces from its origin in the older building.

Dawson fire chief Pat Cayen says the call came in about 7:45 on Friday night, reported by Glenn Everitt, owner of the M.T. Bellies restaurant in the Chief Isaac Centre.

Everitt says that Shirley Moi thought she smelled smoke from the area of the building's laundromat while they were cashing out the till. Everitt said he checked it out and smelt nothing, but looking between the buildings he could see black smoke in the crawlspace.

Cayen says this is where the fire began, in a space designed to give access to some piping.

light held, augmenting the twilight with halogen lanterns in their efforts to make sense of the foundation.

"Due to the floor structure of the building," said Cayen, "with multi-layered floors, it was difficult for us to get from one make because it was such an aggressive move," Cayen said, "but we all felt that this was the only choice we had...There were obvious signs throughout the two buildings that the fire was very well seated."

Hundreds of people lined the City Music Festival, whose offices lay directly in the path of the cat on its route through the building and in the area where the fire seemed to be strongest. Two decades worth of memorabilia and archives have been lost.

Other tenants in the complex included Klondike Outreach, the local employment office, and the privately run laundromat above the place where the fire began.

The firefighters put in about 11 hours on this effort, wrapping up about 7 AM. Cayen and some others caught a few hours sleep and then were back at it later in the day, trying to answer the many questions raised by such a tragedy. All Saturday people were sifting through the rubble trying to find causes and remains. By Sunday the fire marshal had reached his preliminary conclusions.

At this writing the Tr'ondek Hwech'in Council has not released any information about the disaster, so the value of the building and the contents, which must certainly be measured in the hundreds of thousands of dollars. Chief Steve Taylor is not in the territory as of Sunday night, and official statements can be expected from him. One can speculate that the first nation, which does own other property and buildings in the community, is deep into deciding how to transfer their operations to other centers and keep their housing, educations, cultural and social programs going without any more loss of time than is humanly possible.

The morning after the disaster. A gaping cavity in the Trondek Hwechin's complex shows the extent of the damage.

By Sunday afternoon the fire marshal had determined that a faulty heat trace tape was the most likely cause of the fire. The fire chief speculates that it smouldered for a long time before it was detected without activating any smoke alarm. When it finally caught, however, it surged up the wall space between Chief Isaac and the interior offices. The fire retarding material there was not effective in keeping the flames at bay.

Once in the attic, the fire was free to burn in any one of several directions. A fire fighter on duty on Friday night indicated that there were flames in four different levels of the complex at one point.

Crews worked hard for several hours while the evening layer to another. Some we basically chased the fire around in two separate buildings, preventing it from getting to a third."

They tried a technique called trenching to get ahead of the fire, but that failed. About an hour and a half into the fight, the fire department and the first nation council faced a hard decision. The only way to save the Tr'ondek Heritage Centre was to physically separate it from the fire.

A large mobile power shovel was used to chew through and collapse the north end of the Chief Isaac building, but it wasn't enough, and it was eventually necessary to level the entire centre section before the fire was brought under control.

"It was a tough decision to dyke and the surrounding area while the cat toe into the building from the front. At the rear of the building fire fighters were keeping flames and heat from the propane tank and furnace fuel.

The first nation has lost its council chambers, social programs offices, band manager's office, and the offices of its financial arm, Chief Isaac Inc. The Land Claims offices, which are located above the relatively undamaged Tr'ondek Heritage Centre, are intact.

Ironically, M T Bellies, whose owner detected the fire, was spared much of the fire damage. On Saturday, Glenn Everitt was able to recover his tables, chairs and grill, along with many other items from the restaurant.

Less lucky was the Dawson

Scots of the Yukon

Story by James McQuiston

There are many more examples of Scottish discoveries in the Yukon and Alaska territories. For instance, Professor John Muir was the first man to extensively record the glaciers at Alaska's Glacier Bay. The Muir Glacier is named for him, and it is written that "Mr. Wallace, first officer of the steamer Idaho," led the first landing party ashore at that glacier. Muir and Wallace are very recognizable Scottish names.

One by one, Scots were making their mark on the Yukon River Valley and the vast lands that surrounded it. An unidentified "red-haired Scotsman" was the first-known white man to attempt a crossing of the infamous Chilkoot Pass, with its 1,000 foot snow covered summit that led to the Yukon headwaters. He was captured by the same Chilkat Indians who had destroyed Fort Selkirk but was later released.

It is thought that this man may have been the Scotsman George Holt or the Scotsman Edmund Bean, whose family came out of Clan Chattan. Later, the pass was opened by a Scotsman named E.P. McClellan, who faced down the leader of the Chilkats with a Gatling gun to make way for the influx of miners into the Yukon River Valley.

South of the Chilkoot Pass stood the Dyea Pass, which Holt and Bean also opened.

Now, there were three paths into the Yukon River Valley – through the backdoor by way of the Mackenzie River, up the mouth of the Yukon River by steamboats very often skipped by Captain Jack McQuesten, or across the Chilkoot or Dyea Passes, opened by Holt, Bean and McClelland. Scots played important roles in establishing all three paths into the Yukon River Valley.

The ancient art of whisky making carried on in the Yukon Valley. In Dawson City, Jack McQuesten and another partner, Tom "Mickey" O'Brien, were identified as the only two named members of a "whiskey gang" being investigated by the Canadian Mounties for tax purposes. It has been said that O'Brien went on to establish the first legal distillery in Dawson. Jack simply moved over the border into Alaska, where he continued to manufacture his product. He may well be the namesake, if not the original producer of the whiskey known as Yukon Jack®.

The head of the Yukon division of the North-West Mounted Police looking into the whiskey gang was the Scot, Samuel Steele, whose mother was Anne Macdonald, the youngest daughter of Neil MacLain MacDonald of Ardnamurchan, a native of Islay, Scotland.

Jack McQuesten was also famous for becoming the first president of the Yukon Order Of Pioneers, and as the inventor of the sourdough thermometer, which outperformed typical thermometers in reading the extremely low temperatures of the Yukon Valley. He was the first to farm along the Yukon on a large scale, growing literally tons of turnips on islands that would stay warmer longer, using sled dogs and even a trained moose to pull his plow. Jack established the forts Nelson and Reliance, and the towns of Forty Mile and Circle City.

McQuesten grubstaked most of the early miners in the Yukon Valley. One of those men was George Carmack. It is believed that Carmack's original family surname was McCormick, but, because he fashioned himself as an Indian chief, after marrying an Indian princess, he took a name that sounded more Native. Thus, he became known simply as Carmack.

Carmack discovered gold on the Klondike River, whose juncture with the Yukon River was located only six miles from Jack's old post of Fort Reliance. The area nearby became Dawson City.

According to the Victoria Daily Times, "George Carmack, discoverer of the Klondike, says that it was indirectly through McQuesten that he happened to be at the mouth of the Klondike, when he made his famous discovery."

In their writings, both McQuesten and Carmack tell the same story about Jack grubstaking Carmack and suggesting he head to the Klondike to look for gold.

In August of 1896 Carmack happened upon another Scotsman named Robert Henderson, who had found a small amount of gold along Klondike tributaries. Henderson, whose Scottish family had immigrated first to Nova Scotia, suggested that Carmack should check out nearby Rabbit Creek. Carmack was accompanied by his Native friends, Jim and Charley. The three miners made their way to Rabbit Creek, a tributary of the Klondike.

There, along the headwaters of the Klondike, one of the men, apparently by accident, found a thumb-sized nugget of gold, which set off the Klondike rush. After collecting a fair amount of gold, Carmack made his way down to Jack's town of Forty Mile along with Charley, to file his claim, while Jim stayed behind to protect the diggings.

Carmack began bragging about the gold while drinking in Scotsman Bill McPhee's famous Caribou Saloon. He was met with skepticism both because of his reputation for stretching the truth and because it was thought that the area had been explored thoroughly. However, not many miners had ventured up the Klondike due to it being a fishing ground of Native tribes. The gold had been there for all those years, only a few miles from Jack's trading post of Fort Reliance. It proved to be the biggest stampede of the Yukon, the undoing of Jack's towns of Forty Mile and Circle City, and the end of his 25-year career in that valley.

None of the miners had seen the likes of Carmack's gold before. William Ogilvie, still in Forty Mile surveying the U.S./Canadian border, remarked, "it could not have fallen from the sky."

Before long, many Forty

Mile and Circle City miners began to believe the news and packed their gear for the Klondike. Two more Scotsmen staking claims along the Klondike within two days of Carmack's strike were Gregory Stewart and D. Robertson. The stampede had begun that quickly.

A local claims recorder was desperately needed to document the fast-growing number of Klondike gold diggings, and so the Scots-blooded David McKay was elected to that position.

Many other men of Scottish descent trekked the Yukon River Valley in search of gold.

Jack McQuesten represented the Alaskan Commercial Company, begun by the Scots-blooded Hayword Hutchison. At one point the company entertained the idea of replacing Jack. A petition was signed by many Yukon miners to keep McQuesten as their trading partner. Scottish names on that petition include William Stewart, Frank Densmore, Fred Hart and William McPhee.

Jack was the first president of the Yukon Order Of Pioneers whose initial members included Scotsmen by the names of John Campbell, Howard Hamilton, George McCue, Isaac Powers, Ellis Lewis, R. Lowrie, Fred Hutchinson, Pete McDonald, S.S. Mitchell, Matt Hall, Arthur Harper and N. McArthur.

During my visit to Dawson City I also met with John Gould, the now-deceased former historian for the Yukon Order of Pioneers, whose Scottish family name was Guild. His father and grandfather before him were miners along the Klondike, stretching far back to the very beginnings of gold mining in this area.

I also met an extremely successful modern-day gold miner, the Scots-blooded Jim Archibald, who told me that Dawson wouldn't be half the town it is, if not for Jack McQuesten. He said he feels just as privileged, and indebted to Jack, as all those early miners that McQuesten grubstaked.

Though he had already returned to the lower forty-eight in 1897, Captain Jack came back to the Yukon Valley to establish an Alaskan Commercial Company store at the newly founded Dawson City. He had originally left with his family because he foresaw the terrible deaths that would come with the Klondike strike through starvation, scurvy and claim jumping. It was on his return to the North, in 1898, that he met Jack London.

He also may have met Wyatt Earp, who had established a saloon in Nome, Alaska, that competed with the McQuesten Saloon, there. It is known that Earp did become close friends with McQuesten's partner, Al Mayo, and there is at least one story of Earp being in Dawson for just a short while, leaving because he could not keep his firearm with him.

It has been reported that Jack McQuesten brought two million dollars in gold home with him, as he left behind the life he had lived for twenty-five years along the great river.

Back in California, he fed stories of the Yukon River Valley to Jack London in between his travels across America, where he was greeted with much notoriety. He died in 1909, just as he was planning to attend the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition in Seattle, Washington, where many Yukon and Klondike gold-miners awaited his arrival.

Newspapers across America announced Jack McQuesten's death, branding him as "Father of the Yukon" and "Father of Alaska." He has lived on as a character in a number of books, beyond those written by Jack London, and has had dozens of stories told about him throughout the years. His departure from the Yukon Valley was followed by the influx of thousands of men of many different nationalities. The era of the Scotsman dominating so many aspects of Yukon life was coming to a close, and yet so much history and so many Scottish names were left behind.

Scots were early participants in virtually every category that can be thought of in the exploration of the Yukon River Valley, from finding gold to skipping steamships, from naming landmarks to recording weather records, from climbing mountains to discovering rivers, from establishing forts and towns to recording that exploration in books, short stories, poems and documentaries.

Descendants of the early Scots of the Yukon and Alaska still live there, and mine for gold there, even today. Descendants of Scots still record Yukon River history today.

It might be said that a combination of adventurous, brave, persistent Scottish explorers and financial interests driven by Scottish investors led to significant influence in the settlement of the Yukon River Valley by men, and women, of Scottish descent.

But the story is not finished. I propose that not only should we recognize the efforts of Scotsmen on both sides of the Atlantic in settling this area, but also that further research needs to be undertaken to better understand the role of Thomas Douglas, 5th Earl of Selkirk, and his associates, along with the Bank of Scotland and the Royal Bank of Scotland, in financing and pushing forward the settlement of the Yukon River Valley.

Author James McQuiston has long written on the history of Scotland, Northern Ireland and the Yukon River Valley (particularly concerning his relative, Captain Jack McQuesten). He is a Fellow with the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, and publisher of an e-magazine called Celtic Guide (www.celticguide.com). McQuesten has a few books to his credit and has been published in Highlander Magazine, as well as with many newspapers and websites. He has had unique, historical white papers accepted by two U.S. Presidential Libraries and Museums, and has worked to preserve the hidden history of many heroic Scotsmen.
